

The Church Treasurer

The church treasurer should be someone who is:

- 1. Technically qualified.
- 2. Has their own personal finances in order.
- 3. Has the correct motive for serving.
- 4. Understands the significant difference in being an “owner” and a “manager” (steward).

The Church Treasurer should help facilitate, enhance and strengthen the ministries of the church. The church treasurer should NOT be someone who stands in the way of church ministries, or reduces their effectiveness.

The church treasurer should be a person that exhibits a willingness to work cordially with people and has the ability to be fair minded. They should have knowledge of the working organization of the church and be an elected leader in the church. As such, the church should set guidelines covering the length of church membership prior to election as treasurer.

The character of a treasurer should reflect the highest Christian ideals. Their experience and background should give confidence to church members that the financial affairs of the church will be carried on in a fair and trustworthy way. The person selected to be church treasurer should have some knowledge of basic accounting procedures or the willingness and aptitude to learn them. It is important that the church treasurer be a tither.

The church should have clear guidelines on the length of service of the treasurer. This policy should recognize the benefits that come by having the same capable person serve for several years. At the same time, a church should be familiar with the challenges that can come when one person serves as treasurer for too many years.

The treasurer's relationship to church members, finance committee, deacons, trustees and other church leaders depends on the organizational structure of the church.
